Reading-comprehension

MP3 players at school – yes or no?

A.
And of course it's one of the teachers' jobs to stop this cheating. To do this, they have to keep up to date with new technologies. That's because students who cheat are always looking for new ways to cheat without their teachers realising.

B.
Students were writing answers inside the caps. Then came the mobile phone. Schools also stopped these. It was just too easy for students to send each other text messages or even connect to the Internet.

C.
MP3 players are often brought to school by students who wish to listen to music at break times. Many new MP3 players can also be used to watch music videos or films. But some uses of MP3 players are not quite so innocent. Sometimes formulas and other information are downloaded by students onto their players. Sometimes the MP3 players are used to record answers before an exam and then listen to them during the exam. Some students also download their own notes onto their MP3 player and then put them in the 'song lyrics' text files.

D.
Some students say no. They're angry because they say that they used to listen to their MP3 players to listen to music and relax before exams, not to cheat. They don't see why they should suffer just because some students use them for the wrong reasons. Others say that the students who cheat are always going to cheat, with or without a MP3 player.

E.
That isn't because they want students to be able to use them for listening to music. They want them to use MP3 players to learn. Some schools have started preparing educational material for MP3 players. Students can read, watch and listen to this material in any place and at any time. This helps them and motivates them too. It's clear that technology is not always bad. It can be used in highly productive ways too.

1. So, are schools right to stop students taking MP3 players to school?
2. Not long ago, US schools stopped students from wearing baseball caps in exams.
3. Some students just can't stop trying to cheat in exams.
4. There are also some schools that disagree with stopping the use of MP3 players.
5. The latest type of technology whose use teachers have prohibited in classes is the MP3 player.
